

INTERNATIONAL LANGUAGES

Do you speak English?

The first time I was asked this question, my lips wanted to say yes while the movements of my head said no.

In the balance of things left pending for many speaking English has always been one of them.

How would we feel if we could maintain a conversation with our clients in their maternal language, finally, know the meaning of songs and the original dialog of our favourite film?

Doctor Ellen Bialystock, (York University) has dedicated her career to the study of what the effects of speaking various languages can cause to our brain. Doctor Ellen published in a scientific magazine the benefits that this represents for our health to exercise the brain by learning a new language.

Her investigations include the relationship between the language and development, the literacy, the conduct and neuroimage.

The cognitive development is strengthened, the capacity to think, the connection of ideas, mental agility for taking decisions and avoiding illnesses like Alzheimer's, an illness that effects more than 24 million people in the world.

Speaking a second language is not just a simple procedure in our professional training but a why of strengthening or making our mental health better. If we unit the opportunity to share experiences with other students, the satisfaction to reach objectives, the endless possibilities of communication, regardless of where we travel; learn English or any other language is without doubt an option that can change our perception of life and fill us with satisfaction.

We have paid in occasions big sums of money for entertainment or exhausting activities of leisure, brief moments that we barely remember. Why not invest in our time and resources in more healthy initiatives, long-lasting and satisfactory.
